Abstract:

The paper connects the wellbeing of a venture with the wellbeing of the founder, theorizing and testing how the performance of the venture impacts the health of the founder. We link different types of a total of 52,318 founders with their failing and surviving ventures over a period of ten years. Our findings reveal clear differences in the impact of the wellbeing of the venture on its founder, with a negative venture development in many cases being associated with negative health effects of the founder, and that these findings are stronger for novice and full-time entrepreneurs.
